These population-based cartograms depict the outcomes of the 2025 German federal election. This mapping method emphasises regions with higher population density by expanding their area, thereby highlighting the electoral significance of urban centres while reducing the over-representation of rural areas typical of conventional maps. Beyond revealing increasing geographical polarisation between East and West, this approach also exposes the divide between urban and rural electorates.

These maps show that major metropolitan areas such as Berlin and Hamburg - where the Greens and SPD won big in 2021 - continue to support progressive
